Court of Appeals Vacates DIP Financing Order for Lender's Lack of Good Faith

November 18, 2014

The Bankruptcy Code encourages lenders to make debtor-in-possession ("DIP") loans to Chapter 11 debtors. Because of Bankruptcy Code § 364(e), an appeal from a financing order will ordinarily be moot when the lender acted "in good faith" unless the appellant obtains a stay pending appeal. It is hence noteworthy when appellate courts overturn DIP financing orders that were not stayed pending the appeal. In this article, SRZ partner Michael L. Cook discusses a recent Fifth Circuit decision that vacated five bankruptcy court and district court DIP financing orders due to (1) the lender's lack of good faith in relying on a third party's shares of stock as collateral; and (2) the bankruptcy court's lack of subject matter jurisdiction to authorize a lien on third party collateral subject to disputed ownership claims. In re TMT Procurement Corp., 2014 WL 4364894 (5th Cir. Sept. 3, 2014). On Oct. 23, 2014, the Fifth Circuit denied the petition for panel rehearing.
